Power to the Pollinators

A Letter From Our Founder

As the season turns and the soil cools, fall reminds us that gardening is more than what we grow—it's who we grow it for.

Pollinators like bees, butterflies, moths, beetles, and even flies play a critical role in every harvest. They transfer pollen from flower to flower, allowing plants to produce fruit and seeds. Without them, crops like squash, tomatoes, cucumbers, and apples simply wouldn't exist.

But fall is a tough time for these vital species. As blooms fade and habitats shrink, many pollinators struggle to find the food and shelter they need to survive the colder months.

The good news? You can help—right now.

By leaving fallen leaves and hollow stems intact, you're providing essential winter shelter. By planting late-season blooms like asters, sedum, and coneflowers, you're giving pollinators a final boost of nectar when they need it most. These simple choices don't just support pollinators—they strengthen your garden's ecosystem for seasons to come.

At Vego Garden, we believe gardening should always give back. This fall, we encourage you to grow not just for yourself, but for the life quietly working beside you that makes your garden possible.

Tend with care. Plant with purpose. Let your garden be a safe haven for what matters most.

Warmly,

Robert X.
Founder & CEO, Vego Garden

Pollinator - Friendly Fall Foliage

Fall isn't the end of your garden's beauty—it's the beginning of a seasonal shift that supports life in unseen ways. By leaving natural elements like dried stems, leaves, and native blooms, you can create essential habitat for pollinators, birds, and other wildlife through the colder months.

1

Hollow Homes

Solitary bees can nest in the hollow centers of plant stems all winter. Leave 8-24" stems standing to protect crucial native bees like mason and leafcutter bees.

2

Natives For Food & Color

Late-season blooms like goldenrod, mistflower, and asters keep pollinators nourished when other food sources fade, plus add bonus color & visual interest in an otherwise monochromatic fall garden.

3

Leave the Leaves

Leaf litter may look messy, but it's essential shelter for overwintering butterflies, beetles, fireflies, & other pollinators— it builds healthier soil, too.

4

Brushy Shelters

Stack your tree trimmings instead of trashing them. A loose pile of sticks & fallen branches becomes a protective hideout for overwintering insects, amphibians, and small mammals.

Vego Garden Gives Back

Just how big can a garden grow? At Vego Garden, we believe gardening should be accessible to everyone—especially those whose lives it can most profoundly enrich. Gardening can change not only our perspective on the world, and our place in it, but can change the world itself. That's the heart of the Vego Gives Back program: a commitment to supporting schools, nonprofits, and community organizations that serve children, people with disabilities, and under-resourced communities. By donating high-quality garden beds, soil, and growing supplies, we help turn underused or under-resourced spaces into vibrant gardens that nourish bodies, minds, and communities.

Each quarter, we partner with organizations across our home city of Houston, and the state of Texas, to bring their garden dreams to life—whether it's a school courtyard turned edible classroom or a healing green space at a community center. These gardens do more than grow food; they cultivate connection, learning, and empowerment. Through Vego Gives Back, we're honored to play a small part in something much bigger: helping communities grow from the ground up.

Vego Gives Back at The Opportunity Center

The Opportunity Center is a safe space in Houston's Gulfton neighborhood where young people caught up in the legal system—or at risk of entering it—find support, structure, and a real chance to change direction. Once known as the Burnett-Bayland Rehabilitation Center, the facility confined youth to four rooms, behind steel doors and barred windows. It was an institutional setting that failed to deliver true rehabilitation.

Today, it's a vibrant community hub offering education, job training, and mentorship to help break cycles of incarceration. Nearly 75% of youth released from juvenile detention in Texas are rearrested within three years. Many end up in the adult system. The Opportunity Center aims to disrupt that pipeline by providing the structure, support, and skills needed to thrive.

A coalition of community leaders, nonprofits, and local businesses reimagined the space—from one of confinement to one of growth. Urban Harvest, a Houston nonprofit, uses gardening education to help at-risk youth take control of their food and future.

Together with Vego Garden, they designed a space for experiential learning, therapeutic activity, and community pride. Vego donated raised beds, trellises, while Memorial Hermann funded ongoing programs and care.

Over two days, Vego employees, Urban Harvest staff, and volunteers came together to build the garden—preparing it for students to plant seeds, both literal and symbolic.

In the garden, students find more than plants—they find peace, confidence, and purpose. They learn job skills, teamwork, and how to imagine futures where they can thrive—not defined by their past, but by their potential. The Opportunity Center plants the seeds for something greater. As youth grow with the garden, so does a brighter path forward.
